

JANIE, GOOD TIME SUMMER GIRL ROBED IN HER BATH- ING TOGS, CRUMBLES POOR TOM INTO JUST AN "EARTHLY CLOD."

"No wonder," thinks Tom as he gazes at the trim beauty of Janie in a bathing suit, "that Ulysses stayed on the island and listened to the sea maiden's song, notwithstanding Penelope was sitting at home in the spinning room waiting for him."

Contrast the homely utility of "the spinning room" with all this stretch of turquoise sea, cerulean sky and shore of gold.

One holds only "the business of life" and the other is just clamoring to fill existence with romance and love.

Against the background of heaven's own blue Janie's yellow hair, with its perky black bow, seems to glow curlier and more charming in the damp air. Her sunburned arms and face make her satiny throat seem whiter.

LIKE SOME FASCINATING SEA NYMPH SHE SEEMS.

Like some fascinating sea nymph she seems, and poor Tom wonders somewhat ruefully as he tries to look into the browned eyes that are hiding behind the silken lattice of curling lashes is she not like the fabled Undine without a soul to respond to fervent protestations.

Poor Tom, if he could only realize, fit! Janie's heart this very minute is pumping so like mine that she is almost sure Tom will see it under her bathing blouse. For dainty Janie has robbed herself in bathing togs, not toro in the water, but to bring Tom's courage up to the proposing point—and now she is so lovely in her demure unconsciousness of her beauty that Tom's courage is oozing out faster than usual.

"I can never hope that a girl like Janie will love a fellow like me!" he sighs to himself. "I am just an earthly clod, while Janie, perched up there on the pile, is part of the brilliant sunshine, the balmy air, the murmuring waves, the fleecy clouds dotting the sky—Janie is not just a summer girl—she is all the joy, the fragrance and love one finds in summer."
